

How to Plan for Peace Talks

Leave the Kalashnikovs at home. Take the kittens. Take cookies. Men who hate each other across fancy tables will still eat cookies together. Hang Picasso's Guernica from the largest wall and require all sides to pledge allegiance to the dying horse, the lightbulb, the screaming woman holding her wounded baby. At moments of impasse release the kittens. Dose the room with cute until they're laughing. When the warring sides begin to name their kittens, give every warlord a scoop and assign litter boxes. Play Bach's Cello Suites over their headsets instead of interpreters' translations of intransigence. Serve water from the last place each nation bombed. Serve it in vessels pulled intact from the rubble. Somewhere in the chaos of their mutual ambition, grandmothers tend garden plots. Serve them fruit and vegetables fertilized with the blood of children. For dessert, resolution served two ways: honey or vinegar. When they fail to choose, send them home with a colony of bees in each briefcase and guides on how to harvest honey. Make them fly coach, to bathe in the gaze and breath of the people they are about to kill.

Matt Hohner

Published in Fahmidan Journal, 2021. Nominated for a Best of the Net Award. Forthcoming in At the Edge of a Thousand Years (Jacar Press 2024).

A Trumpeter in Sumy Plays the Ukrainian National Anthem During the Russian Invasion, While in Baltimore, We Hold a Bake Sale

At St. Michael the Archangel Ukrainian Catholic Church they are selling pierogis to raise money for their homeland not because in a city nicknamed Mobtown we don't know the recipe for Molotov cocktails, or how to lob them at the vehicles of occupying forces; not because in a city nicknamed Bodymore Murdaland we don't know how to kill fellow human beings in close anger with frequent efficiency, or because we don't know how to write new anthems for young nations while being bombed by a despot trying to erase us from the language of maps, but because sometimes we vogue to Michael Jackson in front of armored police vehicles manned by uniforms from hostile neighboring counties; because an old woman in Ukraine walks up to a Russian soldier offering seeds to fill his pockets so that sunflowers will grow where he falls; because here, sometimes, a Black man sees a White man struggling to pull five hundred pounds of mulch to the register at the Home Depot and gives him a push without exchanging names past thank you, a handshake, a smile; because we embrace the grace and dignity of freedom exercised in the lunacy of dancing in front of a line of guns held by men who would rather kill us than know us; that it's easier to make the everyday heaviness of life collective than to watch one person struggle with it; that even battlefields will bloom again where the dead lay now; that small, savory pastries can soothe hearts grieving for the Old Country, because every mother who has buried a son killed by violence knows that ache; because we know that sometimes the best weapon against rocket fire bombardment from a dying empire is to bless the air with music.

Matt Hohner

Shortlisted, Live Canon 2022 International Poetry Prize. Published in the 2022 Live Canon Anthology. Forthcoming in At the Edge of a Thousand Years (Jacar Press 2024).

A Poet Sits Down to Write After a Massacre

Tree of Life Synagogue, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, October 27, 2018

“To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric.”
–Theodor Adorno

The dead keep piling up and all I have are poems to wrap them in. Pockmarks across synagogue walls are a new font in a familiar language I refuse to utter.
Men have begun again to speak in tongues syntaxed by phonemes of caliber and clip capacity: diction I will not assemble into sentences; sounds I cannot make into words. What color, the stripes being woven like old narratives into new camp pajamas? How many stars asterisk prayers into the bluest night? There is no metaphor for what I cannot abide; no pentameter for the sound of earth falling from the hands of love into a freshly-filled grave. My iambs are a pair of backwards-turned boots in the stirrups of a riderless horse. We measure the inarticulate grammar of fear in the steady metronome of newsfeed updates, punctuate the lulls between carnage with promises enjambéd in the wind. Cover my eyes with verses if you must. Bribe the ferryman with curses and dust.
A poet’s contract is blood-inked, bone-stamped, ratified eternal at the frontier where hope kisses rust.

Matt Hohner

Winner, 2019 Doolin Writers’ Weekend International Poetry Prize (Ireland). Published in The Irish Times February 27, 2019. Forthcoming in At the Edge of a Thousand Years (Jacar Press 2024).

This Poem Has Been Sanitized for Your Protection

This poem is organic, macrobiotic, made with 100% recycled, post-consumer language, and trigger-free. Surface meanings have been scrubbed clean with disinfected phrasing. References to sadness, massacres, mistreatment of people and Mother Nature have been replaced with images of gentle, fluffy animals doing cute things with babies. Theme and tone have been thoroughly vetted by a panel of experts, clergy, and business leaders so as not to threaten the status quo. Diction and syntax were generated using renewable energy. All negative thoughts have been converted to the American Dream. No one will die in this poem. Everyone will go to heaven. Every word in this poem is a military or professional sports hero. This poem can be played on any format radio station. Reading this poem out loud replenishes rainforests and coral reefs. Its carbon footprint is negative. Whales sing this poem to their young. Whispering this poem resurrects forgotten tongues and extinct species. This poem is child-safe; none of its easily recognizable allusions to western culture contain nuts, wheat, eggs, meat, gluten, sugar, salt, pesticides, herbicides, or lactose. Your aunt from Des Moines will ask you for a copy of this poem. Every metaphor is food-safe, hypoallergenic, anti-microbial, and certified fair-trade. This poem will never be censored on Facebook. These lines will be used in speeches by kind and benevolent world leaders because no one can argue with clean poems. This poem extols beautiful things without being specific, because safe poems use words like beautiful and everyone loves them. This poem will look good in a gold frame on your living room wall. Read this poem at weddings and funerals. You wish you wrote this poem, and you could have, because it's safe, and good, and beautiful, and everyone loves it.

Matt Hohner

Second Place, 2021 Vivian Shipley Poetry Award, published in Connecticut River Review, 2022. Forthcoming in At the Edge of a Thousand Years (Jacar Press 2024).

The Unreeving

Green Hill Cemetery, Berryville, VA November 2, 2022

for Steve

Strange now to see your name carved in granite, an absence of stone marking where a man's life became memory. I still catch myself replaying your last lone act of flight, untethered, the run and leap—but in that moment I am on the cliff, reaching, desperate in the wake of your silence. Unable to grab you, I lose balance. The wall of red rock scrolls past faster and faster, the canyon road far below rushing towards us, the wind roaring in our ears, the sudden black of impact, the pile of you crumpled across cold asphalt. I picture the arc of your trajectory, your surrender to gravity betraying your miles of rope, climbing harnesses left behind. I imagine a bin full of ascenders, carabiners clipped to a runner slung on a nail, unpartnered belay devices stopping nothing from falling, helmet now a mere decoration.
Tracing my fingertips over your birthdate, your death a decade ago today, letters and numbers become holds in the escarpment of your gravestone, my hands feeling for a fissure in your façade to hang onto even now, so long after you let go.
Red-shouldered hawk pierces the quiet from an oak at the edge of the cemetery. Sun descends behind a veil of cirrus wisps. Cool breeze shakes leaves the color of ochre, chocolate, and blood, the color of the orange shirt you wore that day, until they release their summer-long grip and flutter gently to ground.

Matt Hohner

Longlisted, Live Canon 2023 International Poetry Prize. Published in the 2023 Live Canon Anthology. Forthcoming in At the Edge of a Thousand Years (Jacar Press 2024).

Chemo

for Corinne

I ask her what color the poison envenomating her veins will be, and she says clear, but we agree it should be blue or neon green, an alien serum meant to almost kill her in order to kill the tumor growing inside her skull, pushing on the backs of her eyes, crowding her brain, filling her sinus cavity, cloaking her ability to smell. The doctors say it is the size of a Snickers bar. By the third round of treatment, her body will feel it: mouth sores, a tongue that tastes of mercury, vomiting, immune system dissolving, hair releasing from her scalp like the leaves from the oaks and dogwoods outside. After nine weeks dancing on the near shore of the River Styx, there will be five more of proton radiation fired through her face to shrink the damned thing further. We joke of Star Wars, Dr. Luke Skywalker, of Yoda guiding the beam from the operating room corner, staff in one hand, his other little gnarled hand raised in benediction like a little avocado Moses. Then, maybe, surgery to cut what remains out of her, and we laugh about Egyptian pharaohs, long nasal hooks, sarcophagi. I say damned thing because olfactory neuroblastoma belongs in a poem as much as it belongs in a person. Besides, I'd rather say Snickers bar, and we laugh until we ugly-cry as we imagine putting her head in a microwave, melting the misplaced confection: chocolate, caramel, nougat, peanut chunks like nourishing boulders borne by a sweet post-nasal pyroclastic flow as she tilts her head back to relish such a delectable gift. How she would simply get up from her treatment chair, walk out into the crisp daylight, savor the fragrant ribbons of spices wafting from a taco truck on the corner, the pungent harbor at ebb tide, the warmth of her own miraculous breath.

Matt Hohner

Second place, 2021 Fish Publishing International Poetry Prize (Ireland). Published in the 2021 Fish Anthology. Forthcoming in At the Edge of a Thousand Years (Jacar Press 2024).